Call for Submissions

Citizenship, Education and Work in the Learning and Knowledge Society

In a political-economic climate geared towards competitiveness, countries around the world seek to transform and restructure their education systems in order to meet the challenges of the knowledge and learning societies. These change processes, determined by the need to compete globally, to close the cognitive and digital gaps, and embrace diversity, mark the orientation of educational and research policies. Disseminating the research that aligns these policies to education is extremely important in the understanding of how to promote citizenship and prepare the new workforce in schools, universities, and teaching preparation programs.

The XIV Puerto Rican Congress on Research in Education invites professors, researchers, teachers, administrators, students, and other interested parties to submit proposals under the following themes: digital citizen; restructuring of educational systems; research, evaluation and academic achievement; internationalization; social responsibility of schools and universities; innovative projects for 21st century K-12 programs; curricular trends in science, technology, engineering and mathematics (STEM); bilingualism and multilingualism; education in values; fine arts and creativity; cognition and language; education, diversity and inequality (social mobility and opportunities); challenges in education facing immigration and social sectors; gender; preschool education; health and physical activity.
